Category:SolidWorksurish length of the twinned zone are in good agreement with the second experiment. The response that leads to the relation eq.(\[exptn\]) is observed when the twinned zone is much longer than the laser beam. In conclusion, we have observed a long-ranged laser-induced attractive force between metal surfaces when the two surfaces are separated by a thin layer of polymer film. The experimental observation is consistent with the second order perturbation theory of linear optics. This observation can be utilized to design new ways of controlling the properties of thin films of metals using laser-polymer-metal interaction. It is very tempting to push this idea further and use the same method for a direct control of surface properties using the laser
